Form 10-K for the Fiscal Year Ended December 31, 2006

Financial Statements

1. Please address the following regarding your response to comment 1 of our letter dated July 20, 2007, regarding your price sensitivity analysis used to prospectively test effectiveness of individual interest rate swaps that are designated as fair value hedges. If true, please confirm:
 - Your price sensitivity analysis considers a base case (non-stressed) scenario. If not, please tell us why it does not.
 - The price sensitivity analysis is used to prospectively test hedge effectiveness for every fair value hedge relationship of this type, and not just the relationships that fail the dollar-offset retrospective test.

2. Your response indicates a fixed set of interest rate scenarios are used in the price sensitivity analysis. Please tell us if these scenarios are reassessed throughout the hedge relationship and how you determine such fixed scenarios are appropriate and realistic during the entire length of the hedge relationship.
3. Please tell us how you determined your dollar-roll transactions meet the requirements in paragraph 47 of SFAS 140 to be accounted for as a secured borrowing. Please ensure your response addresses in detail how you considered the existence of all six characteristics described in paragraph 48 of SFAS 140 in order for the transfer to meet the substantially-the-same requirement of paragraph 47(a).
4. Please refer to Exhibit 1 of your response. It appears for certain situations listed in this exhibit, the start date precedes the trade date. Please tell us if this is correct, and if so, tell us how you considered whether hedge accounting was appropriate for those specific situations.
5. Please refer to Exhibit 2.1 of your response dated August 3, 2007. The modeling techniques described in 3.1, 3.2, 3.3 and 3.4 appear to consider specific hedging periods, however the derivatives outlined in Exhibit 1 indicate there are instances where the term of the derivative greatly exceeds those hedging periods described in these modeling techniques. Please tell us if you perform similar analyses that consider longer hedging periods that are closer to the term of the derivative.
6. We are continuing to evaluate the exhibits you provided in response to comment 3 of our letter dated July 20, 2007 and may have further comments.
