Dear Ms. Murphy:

Although my restaurant does business as Café Sicilia, my company name is NK Enterprises, LLC and has been operating since December 2004 with great success. I have faced many challenges with state and federal regulations and have come to realize that where government is concerned, less is more. Revising the rule to allow greater shareholder proxy access, will definitely cause chaos in boardrooms across America and do great harm to small businesses like my restaurant.

When rules and regulations change for big corporations they filter down the chain. Since we buy food products and supplies from large restaurant suppliers, we will be affected by higher costs being passed on. Our operating costs will increase, we will have to reduce our staff, our service will decline, and our profits will be reduced.

Many businesses in our area have closed during the economic downturn. My restaurant has been fortunate to have steady growth. Customers tell me that when they come here they have a sense of belonging to the community. They feel like they are in the television series "Cheers". Café Sicilia can expect this continued success, if the federal government will refrain from further intervention that affects small business operations. It will be best not to tamper with the existing shareholder proxy access rule.

Yours truly,

Karin Stoman
