Dear Mr. Fieldsend:

I am the CEO Players Network, Inc., a small publicly traded on the OTC Markets. I had founded the company and worked hard to provide a good investment opportunity to investors through my hard work and efforts. Unfortunately, I had been baited in by the allure of quick financing that didn't have to be paid back for a year. What's more unfortunate, what I was told by these investors was far from the truth. They claimed they wanted to invest into the success of my company, that they would hold the stock and then "go easy" when they "needed" to sell. Nothing was further than from the truth. These investors started to slaughter our stock by open market dumping the shares they received from conversions, and it wasn't just one of them. It was all of them, sometimes in the same day. This was a game to them. Not anything like a true investment. They drove down the price of my company's stock through serial conversions and resales knowing the lower the price that my stock went, the harder it would be for me to raise money, and that I would have to go back to them. Unfortunately, this is all too familiar as almost every company these types of investors touch. The stock trading patterns do not lie. The SEC should look at the group of lenders (about 40 of them) that created this industry and are trying hard to save it, and examine their trading habits and you will see, serial stock conversions and sales starting on day 181. The carnage is too great for me to even explain, but it's there.

I am also bet that several companies that previously thought that current Rule 144 was a good thing, no longer believe that. Why? Because some of them have been sued by those same lenders they supported. I won't name names, but they have submitted comments against the Rule change. Shame on them.

Thank You

Mark Bradley
