

I am a retail investor from the UK. Over the past couple of years, I have taken a greater interest in the domestic and global markets.

During this period, I have seen a few of these rules proposed that greatly hinder the ability of retail investors to partake in the 'fair market' structure that is supposedly being upheld.

As far as my understanding goes, this rule only serves 'big money' to self-regulate a rule that allows themselves to, effectively, enact infinite check kiting, in order to get out of positions that they otherwise would not be able to close.

I know for a fact that myself and other retail investors would not be given such liberties, and it makes me question the integrity of the market that the so called 'regulators' are there to uphold.

As far as I can see, in its current state the financial markets of the USA are more crooked and weak, than it is brave and free.
